

Commuting Safety advocates power forward with second trade union leadership workshop to safeguard the well-being of factory workers

PHNOM PENH, Cambodia – 27 August 2020

The USAID Labor Rights in Cambodia (LRIC) project, implemented by Solidarity Center, is supporting a series of leadership workshops for 80 trade union representatives to promote more equitable factory working conditions, including safer commutes for employees. Solidarity Center's partner, the AIP Foundation, conducted the second workshop today, articulating a vision of safety policies to protect factory workers on the roads as part of the Commuting Safety for Cambodian Workers program. This includes driver training, access to life-saving helmets for workers who commute via motorcycle, free motorcycle safety trainings for all workers, a transition from trucks to passenger vehicles, and the adoption of road safety policies implemented factory-wide. The workshop generated discussions among union leaders, who planned actions to support these outcomes.

In 2019, commuting garment and footwear factory workers were involved in 698 road crashes, equal to more than 58 crashes per month. Tragically, 15 workers died and 138 sustained serious injuries. Furthermore, road crashes also do not only impact the lives of workers but also the lives of the 2 million family members they support, and the productivity of factories which rely on their labor.

Cambodia's garment sector growth over the last decade worker safety has been impressive, but worker safety has lagged behind due in no small part to the hazards of commuting to work, which have resulted in high numbers of injuries and fatalities.

"Factory workers are such an integral part of the community. Their contributions to this country and the economy should be met with care for their well-being and safety in return. Trade unions play a fundamental role in safeguarding not just on rights of work conditions in the factory, but also their commutes to and from work as well. Therefore, good collaboration between trade unions and relevant stakeholders are needed in order to improve commuting safety for the workers as well as to keep harmonization and well functioning of factories," said H.E. Min Meanvy, Secretary of State of the Ministry of Public Works and Transportation and Secretary General of the National Road Safety Committee.

"We hope this workshop will help find solutions to ensure safer transportation for workers in all labor sectors," said USAID Cambodia Mission Director Veena Reddy.

"Trade union leaders play a key role in advocating on behalf of their members for more decent working conditions, including workers' safety. This includes the means by which factory workers commute to work. We hope that through these educational workshops, Trade Unions will feel empowered to speak up about commuting safety issues, and call for brands and factories to make worker safety and wellbeing a priority" said Pagna Kim, Country Director of AIP.

"Addressing the rights and safety of workers is not a one-solution approach. It relies on the commitment and collaboration of safety leaders, industry stakeholders, and trade unions and partners, as well as tangible changes, like the provision of safe transport, high-quality helmets, and educational workshops that can improve the lives of workers,” said William Conklin, Solidarity Center Cambodia Country Director.
